GREAT ARTISTS AT LAKEWOOD

Dr. Chapman Announces Plans

The Lakewood Grand Operatic Music Festival, under the direction of Dr. William Rogers Chapman will be given next Monday night, August 25, Tuesday night, August 26, and Wednesday night, August 27. It is the hope that this Festival may be a yearly event and this outcome will be decided by the support this first one receives. It will open with a discussion, at 8 p. m. (Standard) at the Lakewood Country Club conducted by Miss Estelle Lieblich, famous New York coach and teacher who has just come from her work at Ravinia Park, Chicago. She invites all teachers and lovers of music to meet her and sound out the plan for formation of Masters Classes of Music at Lakewood another season. It is hoped to make Lakewood a music center as famous at Ravinia, bringing the greatest artists of the world for the education and pleasure of everyone. The discussion will be followed by an informal reception given by Dr. and Mrs. Chapman for all their friends. This will be the first real reunion and good time since the Festival's closing. Concerning the Concerts and the artists Dr. Chapman granted the following interview:

DR. WM. R. CHAPMAN

"I believe that there is a public in Maine for fine music and great musicians," said Dr. Chapman, "and with the fine co-operation of Willard H. Cummings and Herbert L. Sweet, of Lakewood, we are going to have an opportunity to find if adequate support can be had for them. It is our hope that we may establish here an institution similar to Ravinia Park, but only the support of the public will make that possible."

"To give the idea a thorough test I have been fortunate enough to assemble a group of unrivaled artists and we will be able to give programs never equalled in this State at one time. There, with 'I know,' continued Dr. Chapman, "the tremendous interest in the coming of Arturo Batistoni, whose fine art was revealed to us as a lad, since I, as his genius has been recognized in the leading music capitals of the world, and I have pride that Maine had some part in helping him to his well deserved fame. It is my gratitude to Maine musicians and myself that brings him to join us in these concerts."

"For the four singers, we have magnificent voices. The coloratura soprano, Wilma Miller is one of the greatest artists of the day. She is young, virility and vivacious and on stage or platform wins her audience before her vocal voice is heard. She reminds me greatly of Mme. Alma Gluck and she has scored triumphant appearances with the Chicago Civic and Philadelphia Opera Companies, and in radio."

"From the Covent Garden Opera House, London, we bring Eleanora Mamuray, the tenor," said Dr. Chapman. "He is young and vibrant and the only comparable voice with his is that of Gigli. Both will be guest artists of the great opera companies this winter. When Mamuray sang in New York last season he was at once acclaimed as a supreme artist."

"Our patrons will find an old friend in the contralto, Devora Naderman," continued Dr. Chapman, "for she appeared with us at the Festival in 1923 and 1924. We know that that fame was to be her portion and she gained it greatly with the Chicago Civic Opera Company and on the concert platform. She is the highest paid radio contralto, receiving $500 for each performance."

"Another name familiar to this State is Erle B. Renwick the glorious bass-baritone, graduate of Bates College and whose voice has won him triumph in concerts and recitals throughout the country. The proper place for Renwick is with the Metropolitan Opera Company and I expect to see him there before long. He is young, full of enthusiasm and ambition and has a bright future ahead. His voice recalls the much loved Gwynn Miles who was our great

HAS YOUR CAR BEEN INSPECTED?

Governor William Tudor Gardiner announced Monday that he is very gratified at the response of the motorists to the Maine SAVE-A-LIFE Motor Vehicle Campaign. He said it is his desire to see all motor vehicles bearing Maine registration plates bearing the official yellow and black inspection sticker on the right-hand corner of their windshields. This is an outward sign he said to all people that the car is not only safe but that the operator of that machine is a careful driver and is cooperating with the State of Maine to reduce motor vehicle fatalities.

State police from now on until the end of the campaign will remind all owners of motor vehicles not bearing the official windshield sticker of their responsibilities in this campaign, and the owner of that motor vehicle may be subjected to a police inspection. No unsafe cars should be on the highways of Maine. The Save-A-Life Campaign is a worthy movement and the purpose is to save human lives and prevent injury, first, to the people of our state and, second, to make our highways safer for the many visitors that use our beautiful state during the vacation time. It is hoped that at the end of the campaign every motor vehicle will have been inspected and that Maine will take the lead of all other New England States by having inspected more cars in relation to the number of cars registered in each state. All civic organizations, the press and other civic agencies have been called upon to lend their wholehearted support in an endeavor to save human lives and to prevent automobile accidents. About ten more days are left for the Save-A-Life Campaign. Over 800 official stations are located throughout the state and these 800 stations have been carefully selected by the state officials and are ready to give a free inspection to all motorists, the inspection consisting of brakes, lights, horns, steering mechanism and other safety factors.

There will be no good reason for any motorist not having availed himself of the opportunity of obtaining the official inspection sticker which signifies that his motor vehicle is safe for the highways.

Favorite.

"With this aggregation of talent we will be able to give such music as will delight everyone," enthusiastically continued Dr. Chapman. "The program will include numbers in solo, duet, trio and quartette from at least six of the great operas to hear which the Metropolitan was paid over three million dollars last season. We will give them to Maine people for an amazingly small price."

"The first part of the program for each performance will be given over to solos and the second to the ensemble numbers. For Monday night there will be heard melodies from 'La Traviata,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'Rigoletto' and 'I Pagliacci.' On Tuesday night the chorus will be revealed of 'Martha' and 'Carmen' and other operas. For the Wednesday matinee there will be arranged a concert of particularly popular numbers."

"Is there a public to support good music in Maine?" concluded Dr. Chapman. "Mr. Cummings and Mr. Sweet, through their generosity have made it possible to test that and find out. I believe there is, but believing will not make it so unless there is tangible evidence at the box-office. The price makes it possible. Elsewhere one to three dollars would be paid to hear one of these artists in concert. Here you are going to have five of them for a dollar and a half. With it will go the thrill of hearing famous people in the finest of music. I am counting on that same support which maintained the Maine Music Festival so satisfactorily for many years."

Graphic Outlines of History

THE FIRST NATIONAL MINT

The first public building to be erected by the United States Government was the National mint at Philadelphia. This was built under the direction of President Washington in 1792. It can be justly called the birthplace of our national coinage, for it was the sole mint until 1835 when Congress created several other branches.

Each requirement of every service is carefully considered by our experienced and courteous staff.

MIRACLES by A. J. Dunlop

The miracles of ancient times—
Like Jonah and the whale;
The talking ass that Balaam rode;
The cross that could not fall—
May prove that God abides somewhere,
But better far to me,
The old farm has her miracles
That all can hear and see.

In anxious call of mother beasts
And coo of turtle dove,
The understanding heart discerns
The miracle of Love.
The miracle of Life and Death
Stands boldly on display,
When new-born things the dead at birth—
A scrap of useless clay.

The yawning hill-gaps rugged cup
That holds the blood-red sun
Proclaims the miracle of Power
When day is nearly done.
The miracle of Spring each year
Arrives on tree and vine,
No trouble on the farm at all
To prove a Power Divine.

What's It Matter If They Do Laugh at You a Bit, Sir?

It seems hardly playing the game to get him now?

"If you're afraid, just say so," Hamner's manner was less polite. "But I expect me to want to give a body murderer fair play same as I'd give you." A happy thought struck him. "If the judge says to you, 'Why did you do what Albert Hamner did?' what'll you answer? I'll have told him everything."

At the wheel Bettington was fighting against the desire to sleep. Never had he gone so long with so little rest. There was a great deal of shipping and he had not much confidence in Todd's seamanship.

The dawn was breaking chill and gray when he pushed Port Hancock. There was there that the three flung themselves upon him. There was little opportunity to struggle. Hamner brought down a belaying pin on his head with enough force to render him unconscious. He was awakened by a harsh spitting of the wireless. He realized that the Albatross was anchored. He was lying on the floor of the wheelhouse. He was bound and gagged as neatly as ever Metzger and Reina had been. The pain in his head was now very severe. And with all was a racking headache.

Mrs. Radway came on deck at about 10 o'clock. She thought that Crosby Todd and Bob looked at her with a certain degree of embarrassment. Hamner, the ill-omened, was with her.

The New York Yacht club is sending some one to take us in," Todd said. "They ought to be here any day now."

"I thought the doctor capable of anything," she said, frowning. "He's capable of anything," Hamner cried. "You don't know what I've done for you, ma'am."

"What does the man mean?" she asked of Todd.

"I had to seize the ship," he said. "There was no question of avoiding it. He had done or declining responsibility. 'We found that Ome had planned to escape and we are taking him for the police. You remember to wouldn't let me see the doctor? That was because he didn't want to be caught. It's easier for a crook to escape in New York than it could be in Lamon."

"Where is the doctor?" Mrs. Radway asked.

"She followed them to the bridge. The attack had been made in the cabin, and Todd had no idea that Hamner's blow had been so severe or that so much blood had flowed from the wound. He tried to prevent Mrs. Radway from seeing the man. She fell down at his side and removed his gag.

"Are you very much hurt?" she asked. Her heart was beating wildly. For all, they had betrayed him. There were tears in his eyes. She had seen that he did not dissociate from those who had made the assault.

"They carried out your orders most successfully," he said, and turned his shaggy head away.

The shrill sound of a siren stirred Todd to action.

"It's the Yacht club launch," he cried. Mrs. Radway bent over Bettington again. None else was near.

"I suppose you can never, never believe it," she whispered. "But I had to hand in this. I shall always feel ashamed when I think of it."

When he made no answer she went on deck. Perhaps what had happened was fated, that hour to which she had been drawing near for a lifetime.

time. Mary Unwin had seized her arm excitedly. "How like youth, she thought, to forget its recent perils and present serene front to the world."

"Look," Mary cried. "There's Dad." Evelyn Radway looked down at the launch and saw that there were men in police uniform, too. Then she recognized the senior partner of the great firm which transacted her business. There was nothing she could do now for the injured man than commend him to Mr. Bigelow's care.

It seemed an interminable time before the police questions were answered and she was on the Yacht club launch with the Albatross lying astern. She had been glad to accept the opportunity to leave the yacht on the much faster launch.

CHAPTER XIII

Mr. Unwin Speaks His Mind

The Unwins were speedily to find what wealth and the desire to help them could do. Within twelve hours of meeting Evelyn Radway, their small flat had been abandoned and they were occupying six beautifully appointed rooms in a mansion, whose grounds ran down to the Hudson.

It was Unwin's mission to go to the Albatross and bring back a list of things Mrs. Radway wanted. On the night of his first visit to the yacht, he returned in a mood of horrified excitement.

"Do you remember a man named Hamner?" he asked.

"I shall never be able to forget him," his hostess answered. "Why?"

"A sailor they called Red Mike must have had some grudge against Hamner who, from all accounts, seemed a quiet, civil-spoken man. Mike got at him and jumped overboard with the poor fellow in his arms. The storm was running fast and they couldn't save them."

"Horrible," she exclaimed. "There must have been a curse on the ship. Death upon death."

"And there's another likely," Unwin went on, "the prize crook of them all, Dr. Andrew Orme. There's not much chance for him. Perhaps it's the better way. I should like to have seen him. The police think he was the brains of the whole thing, even the man you called Clements seems to have been less dangerous. They have Orme's record complete and hope to be able to fill in the details of the years they lost sight of him."

Unwin talked on, asking innumerable questions and getting ready replies from all but Mrs. Radway.

Less than forty miles distant there were grouped around the bedside of a man who was not expected to live, an inspector from headquarters, a police surgeon and an official stenographer.

"Now, Andy," the inspector begged, "be reasonable. Why go to your sister with a lie on your conscience?"

"The suspect held out his hands. The inspector did not know what he meant."

"Finger prints," said Bettington faintly; "you haven't verified them yet."

"The inspector did not like to tell him he was rushed to the bedside in order to take his dying depositions. A dead man's hands were just as good evidence as those through which the blood coursed."

"I thought you told me he was all in," the inspector said to the surgeon. "You said you'd give him half an hour at the most."

"He's one of those obstinate cusses," said the surgeon. There was a certain admiration in his voice; he could not forget that here was a member of his own profession who had attained world-wide fame ere crime overcame him. "He's got the will to live," the surgeon added. "Why not humor him? He's crazy to be finger printed."

The inspector came to the bedside. It was not often he could grant a last favor so easily.

"All right, Andy," he grinned. "I'll do it."

An hour later the surgeon was wanted on the telephone.

"That bird ain't Andy Orme," said the inspector with a note of grievance in his voice. "His prints are absolutely new ones to us."

The surgeon found the unknown awake and in pain. The surgeon's look was not as friendly as it had been. He had been mistaking a person of probably no importance with the discoverer of the celebrated Orme method of cerebral surgery.

"You're not Andrew Orme," he asserted. There was irritation in his manner; he felt he had been fooled and the situation was not pleasing.

"I keep on saying so," Bettington remarked, smiling wilyly. "Now can I be allowed to sleep in peace?"

Mrs. Radway discovered in Unwin, a man whom she could trust because he was honest and devoted to her interests. A very great deal of business revolved upon him. For the first time in his working life he was happy. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology was to receive him, and Mary was to graduate from Smith before she married. Crosby had yet to win his way.

Usually the Unwins took their meals in their own suite but very often they were invited to dine with Mrs. Radway.

The three of them—Mrs. Unwin was still unable to move—were invited to a dinner party, given by Evelyn Radway, at the apartment that Todd was to leave for an appointment in Chicago, exactly one week after landing from the Albatross.

At seven Mary heard her father's voice. "The man who was with me should not be able to get to Peekskill until nine."

"Your voice sounds cross, Daddy," she said. "Are you angry with any one?"

"Angry is too mild a term," he said, and hung up. Usually he called her by some pet name, but he was abrupt, different and incomprehensible.

When he came they were sitting around a wood fire in the large hall around which the house was built. Unwin was one of those kindly men given to effusive greetings when he knew his people. Tonight he bowed to them all coldly. Not even to Mrs. Radway did he unbind.

"Daddy," said Mary, plaintively, "you haven't spoken to poor Crosby yet. He's hurt."

"I have no doubt," said Unwin distinctly, "that a young man of his resourcefulness and intrepidity will recover from the shock."

Crosby Todd flushed. He had been told that his future father-in-law was of a kindly and affectionate disposition. Assuredly, the smileless, middle-aged, grimy gentleman on the rug before the fire was not running true to form.

"I'm afraid you have had a tiring day," Mrs. Radway remarked.

"One of the most miserable I have ever spent," he answered. "It is difficult to know just how to tell you about it."

Mary came to his side and slipped her arm through his. Very rarely had she seen her father in such a mood as this. Had he, she wondered, taken some dislike to Crosby? His tone seemed evidence of it. Essentially she was a peacemaker.

"Don't tell us now," she begged. In the morning this black mood would have passed.

Floyd Unwin took no notice of his daughter. He stood there meditating. The girl might not have existed.

"Very difficult," he repeated. "I suppose I had better commence by proclaiming my own inefficiencies. I have been an economic failure, Mrs. Radway. I have worked hard and there is nothing to show for it. A month or so ago I went to an old friend and asked financial aid from him. It was for my children's education. I needed it. He refused me. I learned then something of the scorn success has for such as I."

"Don't Daddy," Mary begged. She saw that for some reason, unguessed by her, he was bent on crucifying himself publicly.

"Another man," he went on, unheeding, "a friend of equal standing in point of years, offered aid. It was not in his power to give it immediately. He set out to earn by his unquestioned skill the few thousand dollars I needed. It was for Bob and Mary he took this burden upon him. I remember that he said he would try and be a fairy godfather to them. Well, he failed."

Unwin fell into another fit of silent musing. When he spoke again it was of another subject. "I have just come from the bedside of a man who is dying. He looked toward Crosby Todd, sourly. 'The man you and my son attacked, wounded and left for the police to drag to the Tombs. I can vouch your caution, Mr. Todd.'"

Evelyn Radway was glad that the dancing shadows from the open fire concealed her face.

"I don't understand you, Mr. Unwin," Crosby Todd stammered.

"Daddy, they had to do what they did," Mary told him earnestly.

"You waited," Unwin resumed, looking implacably at Todd, "until he was worn out from the sleeplessness he endured for you. You and my son took him at a moment when he was physically exhausted. You attacked him when he was suffering from three ribs broken in the fight with the man he killed."

told you. Many times he tried to convince you, but you would not listen. After that, I suppose, he was too proud. He told you all his real name. Can you deny that he claimed to be Howard Bettington?"

"But you went to Bettington's funeral just before we sailed," Bob reminded him. "You identified him."

"I do not want to spare myself," his father answered. "I identified the body of a man, whose face was disfigured, as Howard Bettington, because he wore Bettington's clothes, was living in Bettington's studio and had papers of Bettington's in his pockets. But I did not fail him as you did."

"What man was it whom you identified?" Evelyn Radway demanded, with a passionate eagerness.

"A name well known to you," he returned. "One Andrew Orme, forger and double murderer. This has been established by the finger prints."

"How did Mr. Bettington get aboard the Albatross?" Mrs. Radway still spoke from the enveloping shadows.

"I told you that one of my friends offered help. That was Bettington. Although his reputation was wide he had not needed to sell his pictures, as many do, to live. For the sake of my children he determined to do commissions long ago given him. He went off on his trip eagerly, like a boy seeking adventure. My G—d! What an adventure! In that great August storm which did such damage he was nearly drowned and took refuge in the hut of a fisherman who called himself Jonathan Gibbs. In reality he was Orme, who had lived there many years, having no friends and passing a solitary existence. When Bettington, in Orme's clothes, was forcibly taken aboard the yacht, Orme took Bettington's clothes and money and went to New York and met his death there, as you know. Unwin sighed heavily. "A double tragedy."

He related, as well as he could, the manner of Bettington's abduction. When it was clear he had nothing more to tell, Mrs. Radway arose and asked him to follow her into the library.

"You must take me to him," she said. For the first time he saw that she had been crying. Dully, he wondered why.

"I don't think it necessary," he told her. "He sent messages by me to you all. For some reason or another, he persists in thinking you were justified for what you did. I confess I do not understand why. It seems quixotic in the extreme."

"Mr. Unwin," she said, "I am going to see him. If you don't care to come, please give me the address."

"I'll take you," he said wearily. "I must speak with my wife for a few minutes first."

He joined Mrs. Radway in a quarter of an hour. She was waiting for him impatiently, but they were already on the steep hill leading into Croton before she spoke.

"You were right to feel bitterly toward me," she confessed. "I have always held that love should cast out all doubt, and yet, when the trial came, I was found wanting. I loved him and yet I thought, 'If those seem likely to be the things which can follow us, mind, honor and small pleasures, to blind us and build a wall of distrust which I'd like from me. And now it is so late.'"

Unwin patted her hair with a gesture that was at once clumsy and affectionate. His arms had died down for grief, not hate. He began to regret his bitterness.

"My dear," he said simply, "God is good and understands and forgives. We do not yet know that it is too late."

That surgeon met them who had been disappointed in finding his patient was not the celebrated Andrew Orme. He stared with marked interest at the beautiful woman he knew to be the young married wife of Edgar Radway.

"May I see him?" she begged.

"There are no visiting hours," he reminded her sternly. "But I might stretch a point if it is important."

"It is the most important thing in my whole life," she said simply.

She stood for a few moments gazed in the doorway of a dark room and a padded room which had been the place of treatment for Orme. In this sordid setting she seemed to the man on the cot rather beautiful. She was as the storm of a day had been with a divine compassion. In vain he tried to make some notion of welcome, but his body was limber in plaster casts and his hands seemed too weak to respond to his will. His voice forsook him. He could only stare at her in wonder.

Then she came to the bedside and knelt down and took the strengthless hands and led them to her lips.

"Why have you come?" he asked and dreaded to hear the answer. He dared not allow himself to feel the certainty of the happiness which had come to him at sight of her.

It was when she looked at him that he knew there would be no misunderstanding between them while life remained.

"I came to say good-by and ask you to forgive me if you could. But I see now there is going to be no good-by, and you have forgiven me."

The bitterness of the waste years had gone from her. Over the man on the cot was stealing a new strength and peace. He experienced a sense of protection; he was assured of the return to health and the reality of happiness.

In the outer room the surgeon was discussing his creed with Floyd Unwin.

"When I told him who was waiting, I could see new life coming back. I claim to be a free-thinking materialist, but every now and then a miracle like this happens. . . . I suppose one might say that love is the supreme miracle. . . . But all the same," said the surgeon, "it upsets my calculations."

This tale is delicious in its humor and romantic qualities. Story of an impoverished young Englishman who wanted a wife and would not object if she were wealthy; but he was no ordinary fortunehunter. In America he found a land of joyous opportunity.

Why are you a Christian? Man is inherently religious; if becomes, then, his natural quest to find a religion has led him to his needs: a religion that will bear the white light of honest investigation. Does Christianity meet that test?
Will the Church continue as a vital factor in the future of Christianity, or will it be superseded by something else?
If we accept the mechanics of Christianity, will the spirit of it remain and thrive?

Oxford County United Parish

Comprising Albany, Stoneham, North Lovell and the Waterford. Pastoral Staff: Revs. W. L. Ball, A. C. Townsend; Ralph A. Brandon.

The Staff and their helpers have just completed six weeks of Daily Vacation Bible School; running three weeks at Waterford with an enrollment of 53, and three weeks at East Stoneham with an enrollment of 107.

All the members of the Staff were busy not only in the schools but with their Ford cars in transporting the children. At Waterford this was all done by the Staff, while at East Stoneham two other cars and a truck were hired to supplement the staff cars. In this way the expenses of the schools were less than in former years. The attendance was much larger. The Staff was reinforced by Miss Mary A. Deas, special summer assistant, and by Mrs. Brandon and several local young ladies.

Miss Deas with the close of the close of the schools completed a three months' engagement as summer assistant to the Staff. She has been a most efficient helper and has made many friends throughout the parish, having given religious instruction in several of the town schools before the close of the school year, and made many calls in the homes of the parish. She has spoken once in each of the churches. She begins this week, a two weeks' Vacation School in the newly organized Thompson Lake United Parish at Otisfield.

Revs. Ball and Brandon with their families are spending this week at the Young People's Conference at Lake Coblescontee, where both ministers are instructors, and where Mrs. Brandon is Camp Nurse. They take with them several of the young people of the Parish. Arrangements have been made for substitutes to assist Mr. Townsend in supplying the pulpits of the Parish next Sunday. Rev. Willard H. Palmer, Assistant State Supt. of the Congregational Conference, will preach at Waterford and North Waterford. Rev. Mr. Smith, who summers at Lake Kozar will preach at North Lovell. Miss Kennison, a Methodist Deaconess, will speak at East Stoneham, while Mr. Townsend will be at Albany.

Last Sunday evening an All-the-Parish sunset service was held on the grounds of Camp Kokosing at Waterford. A hundred or more people gathered on the shore, while the girls of Camps Kokosing and Kowawaga sat in their canoes on the water and listened to an inspiring address by Dr. A. D. Leavitt of Brookline, Mass.

On Monday afternoon, Camp Kokosing gave their annual Water Pigeon on their lake shore. Visitors were invited to make an offering for the Waterford Fire Engine Fund.

On Thursday evening of this week there will be a Circle Supper in the Wilkins Community House at Waterford, to be followed by a musical concert by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Harrison of New York and Miss Juanita Sanborn, soprano, and Miss Marjorie Scribner Holt, pianist. Voluntary contributions will be made to the Fire Engine Fund.

Look for the Banner on the pump

Why SOCONY BANNER is a better gasoline—

BECAUSE it's made to start quickly—the proper amount of low boiling points in this new Socony Gasoline gives a new meaning to quick starting.

BECAUSE it's made for instant pick-up—the intermediate range of boiling points in this new Socony Gasoline gives you the fastest pick-up.

BECAUSE it's built for power—the proper percentage of power-producing boiling points in this new Socony Gasoline gives added power which you feel the moment you use Banner.

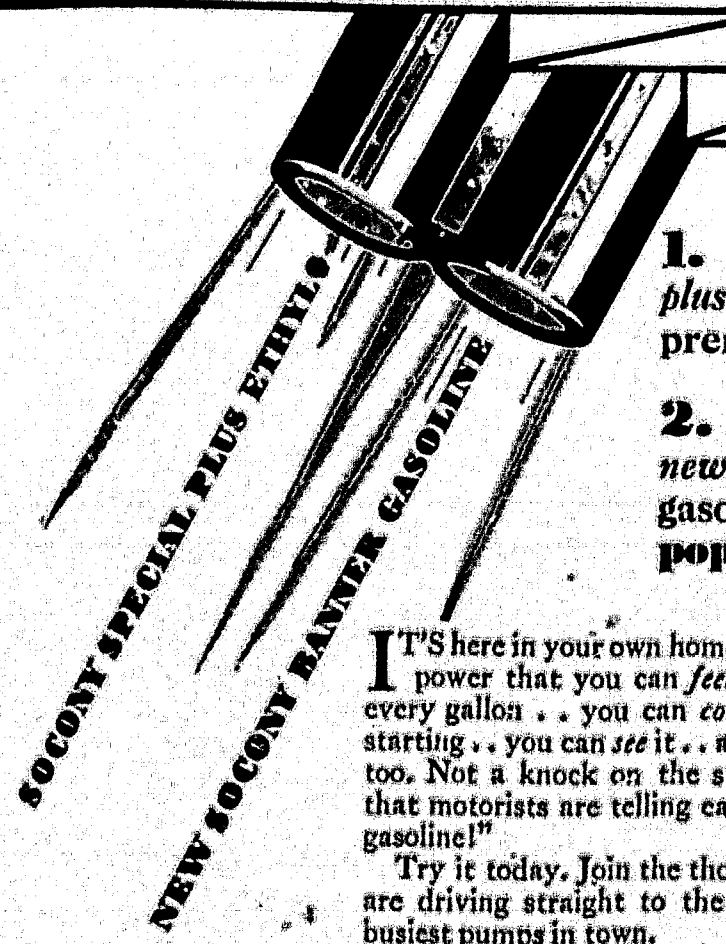

BECAUSE it gives maximum mileage and economy—the exacting range of boiling points of Banner makes it burn clean with the minimum of carbon and dilution, which means more mileage at less cost.

BECAUSE it has high anti-knock value—comes by this high anti-knock rating naturally since it is made only from those crude oils in which this characteristic is inherent.

BECAUSE it is gum-free—the annoyance and expense resulting from gum-accumulating valves and other parts are entirely absent.

These facts based on actual road tests made in Portland, Lewiston, Augusta and Bangor, August 21st, 29th, 30th and 31st.

SOCONY GIVES BETHEL BOTH BARRELS

1. Socony Special plus Ethyl... the best premium gasoline.

2. AND NOW... the new Socony Banner gasoline excels in the popular-price class.

With quicker starting... you can see it... and that goes for pick-up, too. Not a knock on the steepest hill! No wonder that motorists are telling each other: "It's the better gasoline!"

Try it today. Join the thousands of motorists who are driving straight to the Banner pumps... the busiest pumps in town.
